Deputy Bush Counsel Moving On

Deputy White House Counsel Timothy Flanigan, a key player in legal issues related to the war on terrorism, is leaving soon to make serious money in the private world. Flanigan, who has 14 kids to feed, submitted his resignation the day after the elections. He had been head of the office of legal counsel in the Bush I Justice Department and a partner in White & Case before his latest tour of duty.

There's no word on a successor, but one possibility being heard around town, if the administration goes in-house, is associate White House counsel Brett Kavanaugh, a former Supreme Court clerk, partner in Kirkland & Ellis and brain-truster for special counsel Kenneth W. Starr, who headed the investigation into allegations that Clinton deputy White House counsel Vincent Foster was murdered. If Kavanaugh gets the nod, he would sit in Foster's old office.
