Administrative History: Presidential proclamations have been used over the past two hundred years for a variety of purposes. Because a proclamation, like an executive order, carries the force of law, they have been used to establish policy on a variety of national issues. The intended audience of a proclamation is the general public, as its function—to “proclaim” a decision by the chief executive—suggests.

Proclamations were one of the primary means through which the President could communicate national policy prior to the rise of radio, television, and the Internet. Highly significant decisions were conveyed via proclamation; examples include George Washington's Proclamation of Neutrality in 1793 regarding war in Europe, James Monroe's 1815 proclamation announcing the peace treaty with Great Britain which ended the War of 1812, Abraham Lincoln's 1863 Emancipation Proclamation, and Gerald Ford's 1974 proclamation granting former President Richard Nixon a pardon in the wake of the Watergate scandal.

Proclamations have also assumed more of a ceremonial role; they are used to pay tribute to a person or group, highlight a problem or a cause of interest to the President, or commemorate a holiday. Certain proclamations are issued annually according to law: Mother's Day, Captive Nations Week, and Memorial Day, among others. Others are issued annually by custom: Martin Luther King, Jr. Day; Thanksgiving Day; and German-American Day. Occasionally, they are still used as policymaking instruments, such as President George W. Bush's 2007 proclamation regarding a free trade agreement with the Dominican Republic.

Scope and Content Note: This series consists of the official proclamations, denoted by a blue border, released by President George W. Bush. The Library kept three samples of each if possible, and the series includes copies of the vast majority of the Bush administration proclamations.

System of Arrangement: The proclamations are arranged in chronological order by date of issuance.
